

“marketing” is not content.

Insights from 10+ years as a sales driven marketer.

BEN KILLEN

After 10+ years I realised, most business owners are confused on first principles.

When trying to achieve anything, we must be clear with our definitions to ensure we're talking about the same thing.

03 / THE MIX-UP

I found that when speaking to 10 different business owners they all had differing definitions. This lead to poor results.

01 'Branding' touted as the Holy Grail

02 Advertising thought of as 'paid'

03 'Content' sold as the silver bullet

When all we have is a hammer, everything looks like a nail.

04 / DEFINE THE WORDS

Marketing Is best thought of as every piece of communication a business has with its market.

Imagine your business in a large marketplace. What would make your business stand out amongst other businesses offering the same thing? What would make people want to come back?

From how we pick up the phone, to how we send an email. This all leaves an impression. It's these impressions that deliver value.

MARKETING

When we view marketing with this lens, we start to see that almost everything could be considered marketing. This is the unexplored opportunity for most businesses.

Branding The association someone has with our business.

Leading Indicators: CTR%, Opt In %, LTV:CAC.

It lives in their head, not in your logo file. You do not ship a brand in a deck. People form it from every piece of communication — and from whether the thing you sold held up.

BRAND

Branding is only the word for trying to influence that association.

06 / DEFINE THE WORDS

Advertising brings someone's attention to something specific.

Leading Indicator: Impressions, CTR%.

When we get a specific message in front of a person, that is considered advertising. There are 4 major variables here:

01 The audience.

02 The message.

03 The offer.

04 The visual.

ADVERTISING

Customers buy to solve a problem or fulfill a desire.

When we 'market' well we simply use the terms we defined previously to cause them to take an action towards us being able to fulfill their desire.

Marketing does not create new desires for our market.

Time & attention = money

Any action a prospect takes in response to our marketing should be viewed as signal that we're tapping into 'value' in the eyes of our market.

A click, an email, a call, a purchase. Attention and time are currencies.

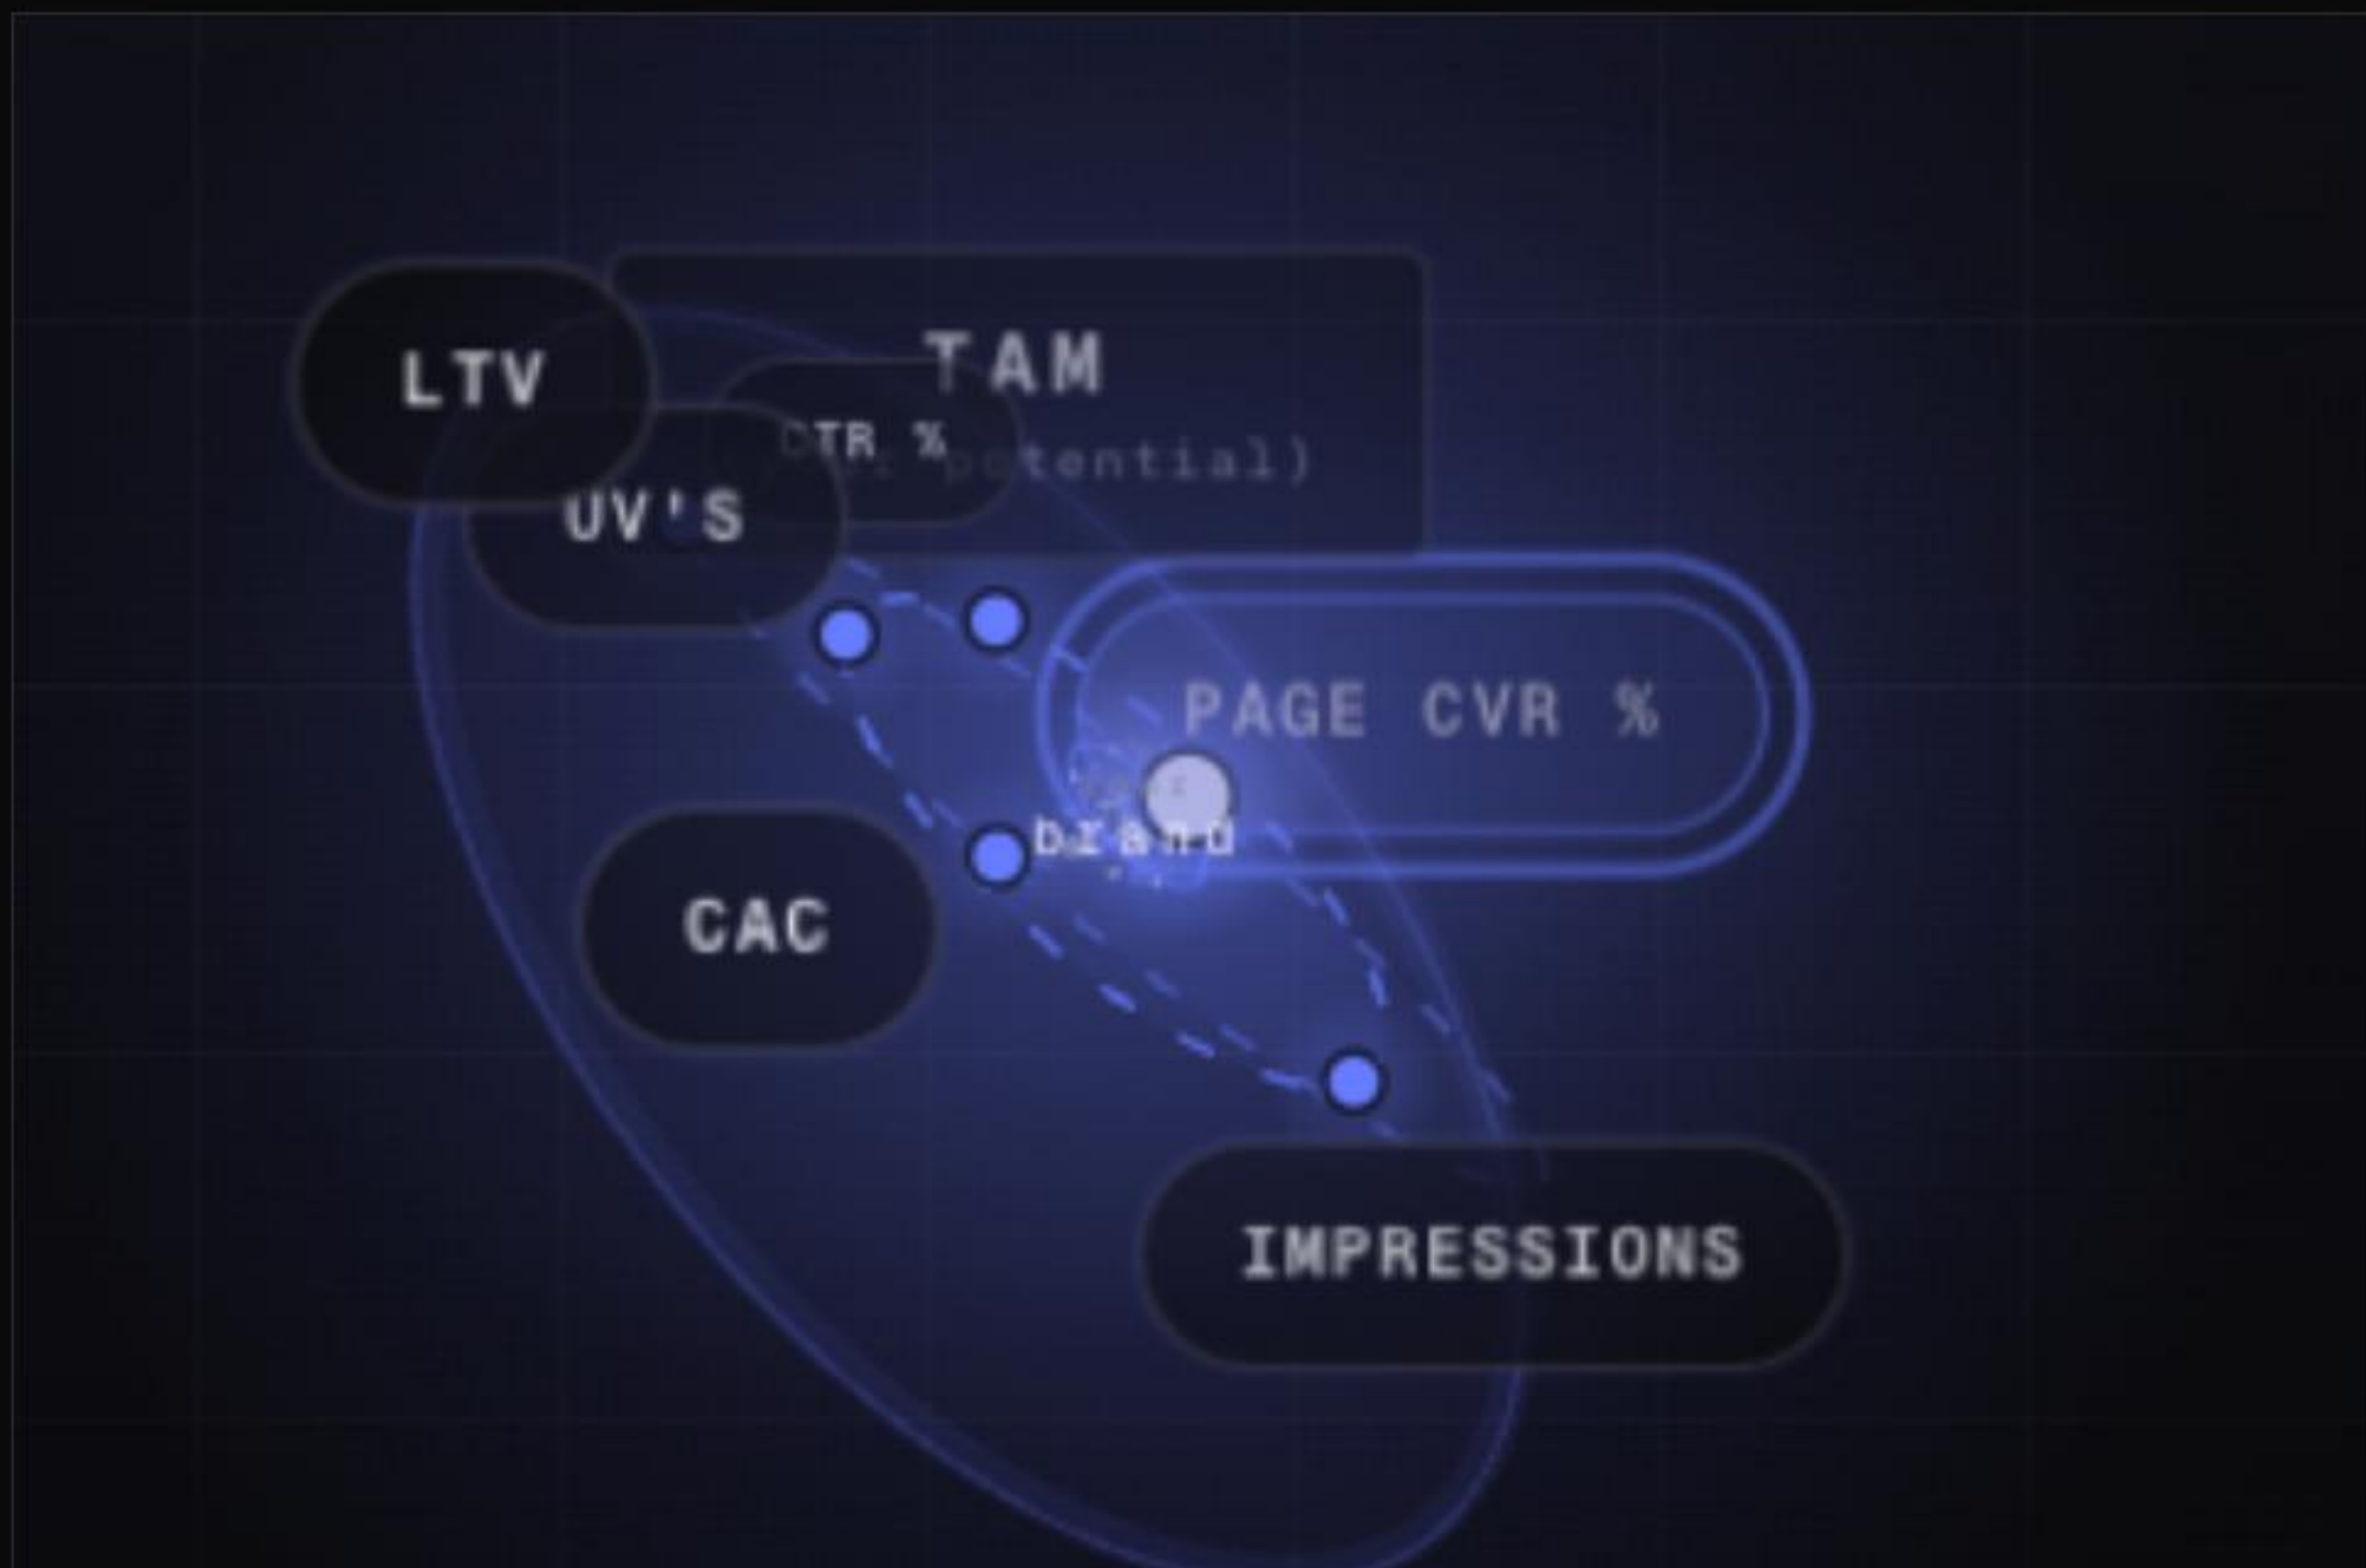

PERCEIVED VALUE

(outcome × likelihood of achievement)

(effort & sacrifice × time delay)

Every action is a signal of resonance. The metrics are the strength of that signal.

CTR

&gt; 1.5%

OPT-IN / CVR

&gt; 2% ideally

OPT-IN → CUSTOMER

&gt; 10%

LTV : CAC

&gt; 3

Marketing is the combination of thousands of variables. When isolated & measured, the key variables above provide the signal we need to start iterating.

Here's the thing. There's only ever one constraint.

If there's a leak anywhere in this chain from 1-6, results will be subpar

|----|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| 01 | Impressions < 100 p/d → not 'advertising' enough                                     |
| 02 | < 1.5% CTR (Clickthrough rate) → offer isn't attractive                              |
| 03 | < 2% Opt In → Perceived value not matching action needed from the prospect           |
| 04 | < 10% Opt In to Customer → Perceived value to purchase not matching prospects desire |
| 05 | < 3 LTV:CAC → Customer leakage along the lifecycle                                   |
| 06 | Ignored LTV → acquisition is treated as the whole business                           |

Marketing requires us to test our hypotheses against the market, one variable at a time. We can't fix everything at once..

Only when we know which number to focus on, can we really decide what 'marketing' we need.

Don't confuse tactics with principles.. For some a new website is a great choice, for others, it's simply more noise
